

of experimental results which bear closely on the chemical precipitation of iron and silica. The work was undertaken with the object of throwing light on the formation of banded iron ores and jaspilites. In addition to the chemical action, however, it seems possible that physical action such as co-precipitation may play a part in the production of these rocks. Further work is necessary before the effectiveness of co-precipitation can be established with certainty. Some cherts and flints may be formed by deposits of silica co-precipitated on the sea-floor with organic matter, the latter being represented at the present time by the carbonaceous matter which is often disseminated throughout these rocks.¹

In conclusion, I have to thank Mr. T. Eden, B.Sc., for much assistance in the experimental work referred to in this paper.

THE PRE-QUATERNARY SEDIMENTARY ROCKS OF SWEDEN, III. The Paleozoic and Mesozoic Sandstones of Sweden. By ASSAR HADDING. Meddel. Lunds Geol.-Miner. Inst., No. 41, 1929, pp. 1-287.

ABOUT two years ago, Dr. Assar Hadding published the two earlier parts of his treatise on the sedimentary rocks of Sweden (reviewed in the GEOLOGICAL MAGAZINE, 1928, p. 93). The first of these was a general conspectus; the second a description of the Palaeozoic and Mesozoic conglomerates. We now welcome the large and well-illustrated volume which forms Part III of the series. Except for the accounts of tracks and impressions such as those of Medusina, Cruziana, Scolithes, etc., the fossil-contents of the sandstones are not specifically dealt with; nor are the accessory detrital minerals, partly because, as the author says, the treatise is but a summary, and partly because "these minerals are never so abundantly or so constantly present that they may be said to be characteristic of the one or the other rock". In the absence of detailed evidence, we accept the latter statement with reservations. The various rocks are described with the idea of illuminating more particularly the characters and conditions of formation of the sediments. The author first makes a general survey of the sandstones and includes a discussion of the form and size of the grains, the cement, colour, mode of occurrence and preservation of the fossils, and characters such as lamination, ripple-marks, rain-impressions, etc. This is followed by chapters on the diagenesis and metamorphism of the rocks. The remaining three-fourths of the book are occupied with a full account of the sandstones of the Cambrian (including the sparagmites), Ordovician, Silurian, Keuper, Rhaetic-Lias and Cretaceous. Finally, the author discusses classifications and decides in favour of a genetic grouping. He adds interesting
