

5 Zimbabwe's agriculture and food security: past, present and future (1960–2050)

Mark Nyandoro and Jens A. Andersson

1 Introduction

Once the breadbasket of southern Africa, exporting food to neighbouring countries, Zimbabwe's recent history is one of food imports, recurrent food shortages and hunger. This chapter analyses the country's pattern of agricultural change and its fluctuating food security situation since the 1960s, and will project the identified trends into the future, towards 2050. To understand food system change in Zimbabwe requires a focus on agriculture as the sector was and continues to be the mainstay of the economy (Nyandoro, 2007). We start our analysis with the 1960s, as this decade marks the emergence of institutionalized food relief as a response to droughts. Until the 1960s, recurrent droughts had sometimes caused food shortages – and severe shortages too (like in 1949) – but until then government had not systematically provided food aid to the poor (Hilffe, 1990).

Two processes are key in our understanding of food system change during Zimbabwe's colonial era: rapid population growth and the racial division of land. When settlers of European descent started to appropriate land in the late 19th century, Zimbabwe was a sparsely populated country with an estimated population of about 1 million people (Zinyama & Whitlow, 1986). A racial division of land was institutionalized in the 1930 Land Apportionment Act, which severely restricted land ownership for the indigenous African population. They were increasingly evicted from the large, privately owned farms of the settlers, and relegated into 'reserves'<sup>1</sup> (Nyandoro, 2019; Phimister, 1993).

Thus, by the 1960s, a rapidly growing African population farmed predominantly on sandy soils that are inherently infertile and prone to rapid degradation under continuous cultivation, and where rainfall is often erratic (Andersson, 2007). A much smaller proportion of the African population was granted privately owned, small-scale commercial farms, in the so-called Purchase Areas, a half-hearted attempt of the colonial government to create a yeoman class of African farmers (Green & Nyandoro, 2024). By contrast, (the descendants of the) European settlers – a minority comprising 2% of the population – occupied 40% of all farmland, the most fertile red loam and dark loam soils found on the highveld, where rainfall is generally more stable and higher (Lima and Lessard, 2023).

Agriculture became the settlers' main occupation and the core of colonial Zimbabwe's economy. The white settler farmers initially struggled, but with unrelenting government support – which also fended off competition from African farmers (Keyter, 1978) – a strong commercially oriented large-scale farming sector was formed. The white commercial farmers could draw on government credit, subsidized fertilizer, seed distribution and marketing systems (Tawonezvi & Hikwa, 2006). The sector was further supported by infrastructure development such as road networks, fertilizer industry support (Minde et al., 2010) and the construction of
