

2848. Mac Naughton, J. July 12. Amended.

Breach actions, drop-down barrel.—In the construction of the double-barrelled drop-down gun shown in Fig. 1, the cartridges are extracted in the act of opening the breach. The extractor lever α is hooked at both sides at the lower end. When the barrels are opened, the hooks strike against projections in the upper part of the slot in the bed 3 and press back the extractor spindle 4'. The barrels are locked by a swivelling bolt B on the hand-lever B, B' engaging an extension of the rib between the barrels. The hand-lever also actuates a lower bolt δ jointed by an arm δ'' to the lever c' . The hammers D are brought to full cock simultaneously by a sliding bar δ^1 at the rear of the bolt δ . The hammers and tumblers are pivoted at d to lugs on the trigger guard E, so that the whole mechanism is removable with the guard. The sear levers f close over the tumblers and are actuated by a single split spring f^1 . The triggers F are pivoted over the tumblers D' to a lug on the trigger guard. The mainsprings G engage with the tumblers by short flat link swivels, the lower end of each swivel being rounded as a journal to work in a segmental bearing in the mainspring. A bow spring, compressed longitudinally, may be used to actuate each hammer. The triggers are secured at full cock by a bow lever H which is pivoted to the rising feather f^2 and is actuated by a thumb-lever A^3 on a spindle A'' provided with a pin entering a cam-groove in the bow end of the lever H. The thumb-lever spindle A'' is locked automatically by a spring engaging in notches in its upper end or by a square-headed piston sliding in the rear end of the lever B'. The word "safe" engraved under the small lever indicates when the gun is locked. The firing-plungers c' are carried back from the face of the break-off, and are placed as high as possible to give the hammers a greater leverage. An aperture I in the strap above the hammer, is fitted with transparent material, so that it may be seen when the gun is at full cock; the lever is also perforated. Segmental pieces marked with the word "cocked" may be fixed to the tops of the hammers to work under an uncovered bevelled slit in the strap. In a modification, shown in Fig. 13, the hammers are locked automatically by a catch at the end of a long double-armed or beam lever J, J', pivoted to the feather f^2 .

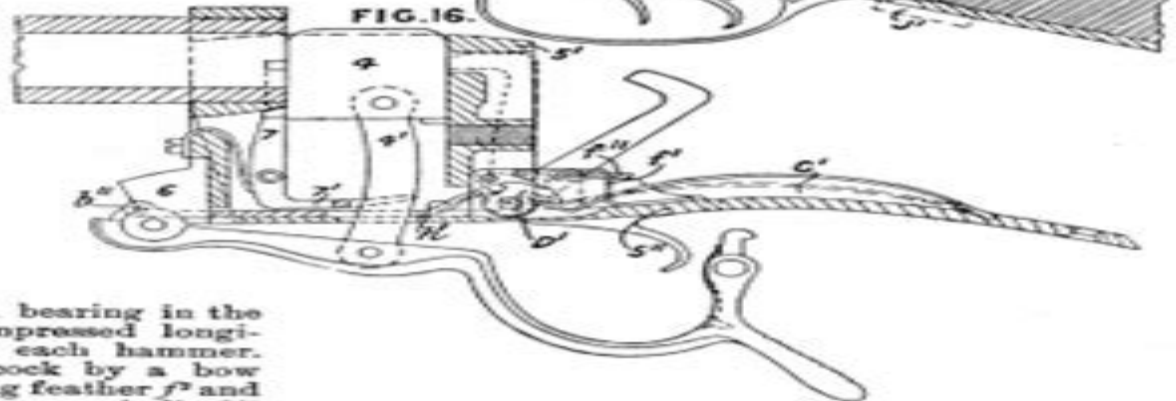

Breach actions, sliding breech-block.—Fig. 16 shows the construction of a gun having a vertically-sliding breech-block 4 connected by a link 4' to a hand lever or trigger guard 6 which is jointed to a bracket piece on the chamber lump, or on the trigger plate. The bell-crank lever extractor 7, 7', is pivoted near its lower end to withdraw the cartridge case quickly, as the block 4 acts on the horizontal arm 7'. The hammer and tumbler D' is mounted low down near the trigger plate. A pointer projecting outside shows when the enclosed hammer is cocked or uncocked. The sear lever is pivoted over the tumbler D' on which it acts by its spring f^1 secured to the plate 5' on one side, while it is disengaged by a lateral arm f^2 . The mainspring G' is of the bow type. The head of the hammer projects forwards and works through a slot at one side in the back of the block case 5'. The striking-piston is fitted in an "angled" horizontal recess, with the head projecting outwards to one side. The hammer is cocked by an eccentric or crank-pin δ'' in the moving hinge of the lever 6, connected to a sliding plate A^1 which takes into a rounded groove in the front edge of the tumbler D'. The lever 6 is locked by a spring catch so as to form the trigger guard.
