

PUBLISHING IN THE ORGANIZATIONAL SCIENCES

The purpose of this paper is four-fold; (1) to set forth the importance of scholarly publishing, (2) to describe some venues for doing so, (3) to provide a basic understanding of the publishing process for each venue, and (4) to give some advice on getting started and staying active. The focus of this paper is on publishing in the organizational sciences. Special attention is paid to journals addressing issues in the field of organizational leadership.

IMPORTANCE OF PUBLISHING

It is an underlying premise of scientific research that knowledge improves human existence. In line with this premise, we find the stated purpose of science to be the description, explanation, prediction, and control of phenomena. Concurrently, the purpose of research is to identify, specify, and quantify phenomena. Therefore, both science and research are targeted at improving our knowledge of phenomena and thereby improving our existence.

It is an underlying premise of scholarly publishing that knowledge shared is knowledge multiplied. If the goal of science and research is to shed light on phenomena, then the goal of publishing is to share that light. While this is the highest and most noble reason for scholarly publishing, it is not the only reason to publish.

Beyond the general benefits to human society, there are personal reasons for maintaining and active research agenda and for sharing your findings in published form. First, there is the personal benefit of increased knowledge. Researching and writing, maybe more than any other activities, help us to organize our thoughts, critique our assumptions, and expand our insights, thereby increasing our understanding. Second, there is the personal benefit of career enhancement. Publishing, whether you are an academician or a practitioner (or the consummate "Pracademician"), will add to your credibility. Credibility, enhanced through the external validation of your knowledge and expertise that publishing affords, pays great dividends. Careers have been catapulted forward by the leverage of published materials. Third, there is the benefit of personal satisfaction. The realization that your voice is being heard and heeded by others is rewarding. Often publications result in contacts from colleagues and organizations that your articles have influenced. The knowledge that you are advancing your field of study can also increase personal satisfaction.

Nevertheless, and not discounting the personal reasons for publishing, it is my opinion that the degree to which scholars publish in their chosen field of study for the expressed purpose of improving human existence, to that degree history will prove them successful in the endeavor of publishing.
