- Liposomes has been explored as a target selective alternative to systemic administration of antiasthmatic and antiallergic compounds and for antibiotics used against pulmonary infections.
- Liposomes are useful tools for pulmonary delivery of drugs due to their solubilization capacity for poorly water soluble substances rendering them more practical for aerolisation.
- Their biodegradability allows for prolonged pulmonary residence times without danger of allergic or other side effects.
- The targeting capacity to infected or immunologically impaired alveolar macrophages is a unique feature of liposomes.
- Padmanabhan et al demonstrated high enzyme activity and prolonged tissue protection following pulmonary instillation of liposome incorporated superoxide dismutase and catalase although the mechanism responsible for the observed protection remained obscure.
